How To Stick To Your Wedding Budget

The proposed budget for your wedding can be one of the most problematical areas once you have said 'yes' and begun planning your big day. You and your fiancé or family might have different ideas about how much you are willing to spend on this special occasion, and even if you have already set a budget, disagreements might still ensue once you start making bookings and putting down deposits. It's amazing how quickly that budget disappears, and how tempting it is to ignore this financial limitation!

Thankfully, our BCME expert panel member and wealth and wellness coach, Rasheda Khatun Khan at www.rashedakhatun.com, has some fantastic advice to help you both stick to your budget. If you're beginning to get frustrated or are experiencing disagreements with your partner about the budget for your wedding day, have a read below and take on board Rasheda's recommendations.

Wedding planning can become so overwhelming. The dress, flowers, shoes, catering, guests you 'have to' invite and, to top it all off, the sheer cost of everything. Not only are your emotions out of whack but your bank balance is most likely taking a huge hit too.

Unless you're a professional Event Planner, this wedding is probably the first time you are organising a big event, which means that no matter how organised of a person you are, things will get messy. Add in emotions to the mix... well.... it's a recipe for an emotional breakdown. Fear not fellow brides and grooms, if you have your budget in order then the rest will run like clockwork.

Having a structure around your wedding budget will make the logistical side of organising a whole lot easier. It will also ensure you stay as close to your budget as possible.
